

BRITAIN SUGGESTS FORMING "CLEARING HOUSE FOR HATE"

Conference of Major European Powers, to Thresh Out Troubles

ALARMED OVER CRISIS

Fresh Appeal Addressed By Secretary Eden to Germany and Italy

By Kingsbury Smith
(I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)
LONDON, Jan. 7.—(INS)—A great "clearing house for hate"—a conference of major European powers at which international troubles arising from the Spanish civil war would be threshed out—was proposed today by Britain.

Alarmed over the Leftist-Fascist crisis, Britain again took the leadership in peace efforts, putting forward the conference plan as a means of winning favorable replies on non-intervention from Berlin and Rome.

A fresh appeal was also addressed by Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden to Germany and Italy for replies by tomorrow on the French-British plan to ban dispatch of "volunteers" to Spain.

Through Sir Eric Phipps in Berlin and Sir Eric Drummond, Eden said Britain would assume the responsibility for calling a big conference immediately should reaction abroad be favorable.

Representatives Given Committee Assignments

HARRISBURG, Jan. 7.—Bucks County Republicans will have a prominent part in legislative proceedings this year, if important committee assignments are an indication.

The veteran Senator Clarence J. Buckman has been given places on both the finance and appropriations committees of the Senate. In addition he has been made a member of the committees on highways, insurance, game and fish, judiciary general, city government, rules, public utilities and federal relations.

The two Bucks County House Members have been similarly honored. Thomas B. Stockham, of Morrisville, has been assigned to places on the public utilities, public health and sanitation, boroughs, geologic survey and municipal corporations committees. In addition he is a member of the new State Boards committee, which promises to be important.

Wilson L. Yeakel, of Perkasie, has been assigned to one of the coveted agriculture committee places. He will also serve on these other committees: Railroads and railways, building and loan associations, highways, manufactures and ways and means.

THRONG JAMS THE HAGUE FOR THE ROYAL WEDDING

Long Lecture On Married Life Given Holland's Princess By the Burgomaster

THEN RELIGIOUS RITE

THE HAGUE, Jan. 7.—(INS)—Legally married and given a long lecture on married life by the Burgomaster of The Hague, Crown Princess Juliana and Prince Bernhard of Lippe-Biesterfeld drove in state today to the Grootke Kirke for their religious ceremony.

The greatest throng in the history of the "City of Peace" jammed its narrow streets, filled its shop windows and covered its roof tops to cheer and sing as the gilt carriage that bore Queen Wilhelmina to her wedding 35 years ago carried Juliana and Bernhard to the Town Hall.

There the ceremony was simple and brief. The couple answered a few formal questions put by the beaming Burgomaster and then signed the marriage book, followed by their witnesses.

Then, just as Dutch tradition calls for in the case of the marriage of persons of any degree, the Burgomaster solemnly delivered a homely lecture on how to achieve happiness in married life.

LEGION PRESSES PROBE OF CARVERSVILLE ORPHANAGE

Atkinson Post Will Co-operate in Seeing if Conditions Are As Reported

COUNTY TO AID PROBE

DOYLESTOWN, Jan. 7.—The members of the A. R. Atkinson, Jr., Post, No. 210, American Legion, is pressing an investigation of the Carversville Christian Orphanage, where a small group of children are alleged to have been in need before the Christmas season.

The American Legion is vitally interested in child welfare work, one of its main objectives for 1937.

"We can make an investigation and notify the authorities what is going on, if we find things are not properly conducted, and then we will be doing some good," declared an officer of the post.

Before Christmas the Atkinson Post interested itself in the orphanage when they reported they found a bad case of mismanagement on the part of the alleged "higher-ups" in the home. They found a matron struggling along on low wages who had not received a cent of salary for many months. They found about a dozen children living in a big home, heated with wood and lacking the necessary food for growing children.

"The courage of the matron in charge was simply wonderful," said one member of the Legion investigating committee.

The county court has been informed of the Legion's investigation and has already ordered the proper county official to personally investigate the affairs of the home.

In the meantime, the American Legion will see to it that none of the children want for lack of food and clothing. The Atkinson Post is willing to sponsor one of the boys and other service clubs in Doylestown will be asked to co-operate until the entire situation can be cleared up.

The supervising head of the orphanage, a minister, will be questioned during the next ten days in an effort to find out what has actually been going on in regards to financing the orphanage.

It was the unanimous opinion of the Atkinson Post members present at the meeting this week that the Legion committee continue to investigate until some satisfactory action is taken to improve conditions at the orphanage.

SELLERSVILLE PROTESTS RATES FOR SEWER SERVICE

Complaints Are Filed With The Public Service Commission

APPOINTMENTS MADE

SELLERSVILLE, Jan. 7.—Borough Council was informed at its monthly meeting that a complaint has been filed against the Perkaskie Sewer Company, protesting its 25 percent increase in the sewer rates. The complaint was forwarded to the Public Service Commission which has restrained the sewer company from making the change in rates until after May. A similar protest was made recently by Perkaskie Borough Council.

Three charges of unfairness were cited by Council as follows: That the proposed rates are discriminating, that it would not be practical to collect the rents a year in advance and that levying such a rent on vacant properties would work a hardship on the borough.

During the past two weeks the sewer company put into operation new equipment which cost about $40,000. The Public Service Commission hinted that there might be a change in the sewer company's proposed rates. The Perkaskie Sewer Company, it was said, agreed on the second charge made by Council, that it would be impracticable to collect the rentals a year in advance.

Three local offices were filled by appointments. Two vacancies took place in the Sellersville Park Commission through the expiration of the terms of David D. Cressman and Herbert Heinrichs. Mr. Cressman was re-appointed for a three-year term. Harvey C. Clymer was re-appointed a member of the Sellersville Board of Health for a term of five years.

Parking on Penn and Church streets will be restricted by a new ordinance proposed by Council. This was introduced because parking on these two streets makes driving dangerous, especially on Sundays. If the ordinance is passed, parking will be permitted on only one side of these streets.

Councilman R. F. Stacker reported a gain of $27,000 in real estate assessments here during the past year. He said the increase was due principally to the Bucks county real estate registry which compiled a complete list of properties and their owners. A large number of new taxpayers were uncovered by this survey.

This survey included the location of an owner of a strip of land on Washington avenue, the ownership having been in doubt for many years. A school house had formerly been located there and since that time the property changed owners a number of times. The place is now owned by Robert Frailey. Another adjoining strip was found to be owned by the late William S. Schlichter.

In the future the registry will be kept up to date by the borough secretary. Through it Council will be able to keep an accurate account on the property owners paying taxes.

Motor Industry "Dove of Peace" Back

Detroit, Mich., Jan. 7.—The dove of peace came back to the threshold of the automobile industry today as General Motors and United Auto Workers Union were brought together indirectly on a tentative basis of negotiation, by the Federal government.

There stood out, however, at least two stumble blocks, as Federal mediators sought to iron out difficulties that have left an estimated 110,000 men and women idle, and threatened the $5,000,000,000 auto industry even more alarmingly.

The two snags: 1. Recognition of the union as the sole collective bargaining agency for General Motors 235,000 employees. 2. Withdrawal of sit-down strikers from the plants they occupied.

PRIVATE FIRE ALARM AROUSES FAMILY OF FOUR AS BLAZE RAGES IN BASEMENT AND TONGUES OF BURNING GAS ENVELOP CELLAR

Abe Popkin and Family Have Narrow Escape Making Their Way From Sleeping Quarters to Street—Infant Carried Out by Sidney Popkin — Flames Fought Under Difficulties

A private fire alarm system installed in the basement of a Mill street business establishment aroused the occupants of the apartment on the second floor this morning, and they made their way to safety through dense smoke and escaping gas, which enveloped the entire interior of the building.

The fire was confined to the basement of the Abe Popkin shoe store, 418 Mill street, after hard work by the firemen, who fought the flames under difficulty. The loss is estimated at about $1500 to $2,000. Mr. and Mrs. Popkin and their two sons made their way into the street during a sleet storm.

Firemen have not as yet determined the cause of the blaze, which originated in the basement, and was confined there. The damage which was done was due mainly to heat, smoke and water. The entire building was choked with smoke and escaping gas.

CARDS ON SATURDAY

Mrs. Andrew Moore is chairman of the card party which Catholic Daughters of America will sponsor in the K. of C. home, Saturday, at 8:30 p. m. Pinochle and "500" will be played.

Miss Gertrude Pope, Wood and Washington streets, spent Sunday visiting Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Comfort, White Horse, N. J.

It was shortly before four o'clock when Mrs. Popkin was aroused by the ringing of a fire alarm system which operates from the basement. She aroused her husband, who leaping from his bed, ran downstairs through the heavy smoke and gas fumes and found that the basement was ablaze. An alarm was telephoned to the Bristol Consolidated Fire Department, and one apparatus was sent immediately. Then a general alarm was sounded.

After Mr. Popkin reached the first floor and found the smoke growing more dense and the fumes stronger, he returned to the second floor and aroused the other members of the family. Sidney Popkin grabbed his infant brother and carried him out into the street, while Mrs. Popkin made her way out of the premises.

Firemen had difficulty in reaching the flames which were in the basement due to the density of the smoke and fumes. A hole was broken through tiling beneath a display window after efforts to pry open an iron door in the sidewalk failed.

Firemen directing hose lines into the basement, which was heavily stocked with rubber goods, found that tongues of flames would shoot off in other directions when beaten back by the water. It took but a short time for them to realize that these tongues of flames were burning gas, fed, evidently, from a broken gas line.

The cellar nozzle was brought into play and a hole cut through the main floor of the building. The revolving nozzle was inserted and hose line attached. This revolving nozzle threw water over the entire area of the basement and soon quenched the gas flames so that the firemen could make their way to the meter and shut off the supply.

Smoke broke through into the adjoining premises occupied by David Norman and family, where the Popkins sought shelter from the cold and sleet.

Mr. Popkin said today that had it not been for the private fire alarm system in the basement and which operates a bell in the hallway on the second floor, he doubted if he or his family would have successfully made their escape. "When I reached the first floor the smoke and fumes were terrific. I aroused the other members of the family and telephoned for the firemen."

Mr. Popkin installed the alarm system several years ago, on the advice of a friend.

GOOD OLD LAISSEZ FAIRE

When Premier Blum's Popular Front government took office in France, there was much talk of its reddish tinge. Some apprehensive souls were quite sure that France had gone Communist and that the Devil was on the loose in the Champs Elysees.

Now comes Vincent Auriol, M. Blum's minister of finance and, like his chieftain, a good Socialist, to tell French capitalists and investors that they have nothing to fear. Explaining that under the three-power money accord and the French government's domestic currency policy, "our monetary system has full and entire freedom," M. Auriol hastened to add:

"This freedom concerns not only liberty of circulation, but also liberty of investment. In future we only ask for honesty in declarations. He who pays his taxes regularly and makes the declarations prescribed by law will have nothing to fear, whether his capital is in France or outside."

In other words, all the Blum government asks of French capitalists is that they file honest tax returns and pay what is due. John Elliott, the Paris correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, interprets the Auriol speech as meaning a French "return to the classical system of laissez faire and complete financial liberty of capital to move where it likes."

If Mr. Elliott's diagnosis is correct, Mr. Blum's government is returning to traditional economic liberalism. But won't our pseudo-liberals be fit to be tied when they read that France's real liberals still believe in "laissez faire"?

BRIDGE TABLE EMOTIONS

According to no less an authority than Ely Culbertson, anyone who plays contract bridge of expert quality has to be "slightly insane." Rarely are our top flight bridge performers adverse to anything in the way of publicity and it may be that this is another of Ely's bids for notice.

If it is, it has succeeded. In any event, there comes in rebuttal the opinion of an English scientist—James Hopwood Jeans—that bridge is better than a course of formal lectures for improving the mind. It teaches a person, he says, "to make rapid decisions, plan a course of action, and to estimate odds, besides inculcating habits of courtesy and tact."

This is an interesting difference in points of view, and especially interesting is the notion that bridge fosters a graciousness in its devotees. The tournaments of the game's stars are not famous for the urbanity of the players, but for tantrums and exhibitions of ham temperament. Mr. Culbertson has given signs before now that he is aware of this defect in his peers, and it may be that his new confession is only a way of saying, "Don't mind us, folks, we're just a lot of nuts." If Theorist Jeans ever has occasion to meet Ely across the table of cards, he will, of course, keep this in mind.

There is a hygienic generation growing up in the land that never reached into a crock at the bend in the cellar stairs for a handful of mince meat in passing.

There has been a general turning of worms. China is talking back to Tokyo, and one of Phil Baker's stooges has got into the Hollywood big money.

"LUXURY" MODEL" by MAY CHRISTIE

SYNOPSIS

On the train, enroute to her home in Los Angeles from college, lovely Elizabeth Harmon meets handsome Gerald Bruton, young stock broker. Full of the zest for living, Elizabeth speaks of her ambitions for a career. After luncheon, Gerald suggests a liqueur. Elizabeth had never tasted intoxicants but, fearing her companion may think she had been posing, she accepts.

CHAPTER II

The waiter brought a bottle and two glasses the size of thimbles. He poured out a pale liquid that seemed to have captured some of the Spring sunshine in it.

Elizabeth tasted hers. The sweet strong stuff was like fire in her veins. "Like it?" "It's gorgeous. What did you call it?"

"Benedictine." She sipped again. She said: "It's a bit fiery. Whatever is it made of?"

"That's a secret known only to the Benedictine monks."

"But how extraordinary!" "For centuries," he said, "they've made it in their monasteries. And no one's ever yet found out the recipe."

She thought: "He's chosen this—like a religious blessing on our meeting." Every nerve in her body tingled as she looked at him, and her heart rose.

"But how terrible to be shut away from the world!" she remarked breathlessly.

Gerald Bruton's lips twisted in a faintly ironical grin. The warmth went out of his eyes as though a light had suddenly been snapped off. "You're right," he agreed tonelessly.

"Yet they go into it of their own free will. It seems—inconceivable." "To anyone as young as you. I suppose it's never occurred to you there can be a hell upon earth—for some poor devils?"

"Disappointments, you mean?" He gave a bitter laugh. "You're like the child Pipkin in Browning's poem. 'God's in His Heaven, all's right with the world.' That was her theme song."

"And what's the matter with that?" she flashed. "Isn't it a thousand times better to believe in things—to be happy than miserable?"

"Weren't you criticizing women a little while ago for hiding their heads in the sand? More, don't you realize that women are very often at the bottom of men's misfortunes?"

"You mean," she said with unexpected perspicacity, and quite partly, "that behind many monks in their monastery, 'cherchez la femme'?"

"Not literally, I hope." His eyes twinkled for a moment, then darkened. "But often theoretically that's quite true."

She thought: "He's had a love disappointment. That accounts for the lines in his face, and the little white tufts over his ears." And she felt a sudden fierce resentment at the unknown woman who had made him suffer. It was unthinkable that any feminine creature could have made him suffer, for he was so attractive.

From his coat pocket he drew out a heavy gold case with the same monogram on it as on his wallet. He flicked it open.

"Will you have one? These are Egyptians at this end. Domestic at the other."

She took a cigarette that had a gay red tip to it. He lit it for her. He drew back to light his own.

Suddenly she saw the hand that held the match halt in midair, and his eyes, looking beyond her, dilated in a face that had curiously whitened. The match slipped from his fingers to the tablecloth, burning a tiny hole; he did not see it. Someone was coming down the passage of the luncheon coach. The someone was a man—a heavily set, roughly dressed man—who halted awkwardly at their table, exclaiming abruptly:

"Why, of all things! I—I never expected to see you in this part of the world!"

In the living room of the comfortable small house set in the orange grove that he had purchased on retiring from the Army, Colonel McCarthy regarded his step-daughter, Elizabeth Harmon, with definite irritation.

"You were out till two o'clock this morning, Elizabeth. Might I inquire with whom?"

She flushed, but returned his gaze steadily. She was essentially truthful and straightforward. She would not prevaricate.

"I was with Gerald Bruton. You know, one of the Bruton family—the brokers. We'd a grand time. We."

"How long have you known him?"

"I met him on the train coming down."

"Without introduction?" The Colonel's eyebrows shot up, giving in desperate impatience, Elizabeth had dined and danced at a country inn, with the scent of flowering lemon and verberna and the thousand heady odors of a Southern Spring drifting in at the open windows. Trembling with the ecstasy of a strange, uncharted feeling she had never known before, Elizabeth had been wildly happy.

Now—this anti-climax! Her step-father rose, went to the door, and put on his hat. "Remember what I've said, Elizabeth." He turned sharply. The words came like little explosions, crackling the silence that lay between them.

"There's to be no going out with this Gerald Bruton. There's never been a scandal in our family. Apart from other considerations, I owe it to your dead mother to see that never will be one!"

"You were out till two o'clock this morning, Elizabeth. Might I inquire with whom?"

him a grotesque resemblance to a Gargoyle. She said hastily: "Oh, we happened to be at the same table for luncheon. It seemed quite natural to talk. He was so gentlemanly—and interesting."

"Indeed?"—sarcastically. "A gentleman is someone who picks a young girl up on a train and pursues the acquaintance without even having the decent manners to call at her home? How do you know his name is Bruton? Like as not he made that up to impress you."

Elizabeth produced his card. Her step-father glared at it, and with an unbelieving "Humph!" put it in his pocket.

"Instead of running around at night, it would be much better and more seemly for you to take care of the house. I won't have you going out with Tom, Dick and Harry. As for this man, if he is one of the Brutons, it makes it all the worse, since he must know what's what and what isn't."

Elizabeth was no coward to be browbeaten. She had never got on with her step-father, and now, after a year's absence from home, the breach had widened. With the memory of last night singing in her mind, the thought of interference was intolerable. Why, Gerald Bruton had treated her like a little queen! The hours had been golden, unforgettable. Doubly radiant, too, because of the months of darkness and seclusion that had preceded them.

both waited for the telephone to ring. Gerald had promised to call her between three and four to make arrangements for the evening. The hands of the grandfather clock pointed to ten minutes past four. At any moment Colonel McCarthy might return. Probably with renewed antagonism, because of his seclusion, due to a dampness in the air today and because of the gulf that divided fifty-seven from nineteen.

Jealous of youth! Wanting his own life over again! Hating the feast of years and happiness that stretched before her!

So thought Elizabeth, who had studied books of psychology in college, and found them illuminating, though depressing.

She bitterly resented the Colonel's criticism. He was a peppy and unreasonable martinet, she thought. Surely he must have made her mother most unhappy in the few years they had been together. She wouldn't let him spoil her life. She was resolved on that.

The telephone tinkled. It was Gerald. Happy defiance in her eyes, her chin held jauntily up, Elizabeth accepted his invitation.

"No, don't call for me. I shall be in Hollywood by six. I'll meet you in the lobby of the Knickerbocker."

She would go in by bus. Nothing her step-father could say or do would stop her. (To Be Continued)
